

In case you did not receive my comment about efforts to restrict telephone solicitations, I want you to know that I am very glad at Indiana the state in which I reside has devised a program whereby tenants or householders can sign up in order to stop telephone solicitations. Occasionally they still get through, and sometimes I still get rings and when I go to pick up my receiver the ringing stops. I find this very annoying, but often the company which is calling, whether a "real" person or a recording speaks so fast and incoherently that I cannot catch the name or purpose in order to report the violation. As I've told you, the First Amendment does not not apply in telephone solicitations, whether they are personal or automatic. People do not have the right to enter my house to sell me things or to ask me to contribute money for a purported charity unless I admit them. My picking up the telephone receiver to respond to the telephone's ring should not be equated to letting some stranger set his or her foot in my door!
